2011

Origins of the Social Function of Property in Chile

M C. Mirow
Florida International University College of Law, mirowm@fiu.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://ecollections.law.fiu.edu/faculty_publications
Part of the Law and Society Commons, and the Property Law and Real Estate Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://ecollections.law.fiu.edu/faculty_publications/114

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Faculty Scholarship at eCollections @ FIU Law Library. It has been accepted for inclusion in Faculty Publications by an authorized administrator of eCollections @ FIU Law Library. For more information, please contact lisdavis@fiu.edu.
Origins of the Social Function of Property in Chile

M.C. Mirow*

One may say that in fact the concept of property as a subjective right disappears, to be replaced by the concept of property as a social function.

Professor Léon Duguit, 1923

One may say that in fact the concept of property as a subjective right disappears, to be replaced by the concept of property as a social function.

President Arturo Alessandri, 1925

These identical passages indicate the influence the thought of Léon Duguit had on President Alessandri as he guided the drafting of the Chilean Constitution of 1925 and its provision on property. Since the 1920s, numerous countries in Latin America have promulgated

---

* Professor of Law and Associate Dean of International & Graduate Studies, FIU College of Law, Miami; Fulbright Scholar, Pontificia Universidad Católica de Valparaíso, Chile, 2009; Membre Associé, Centre Georges Chevrier (UMR – 5605 Université de Bourgogne/CNRS), Dijon, France; Investigador Honorario, Escuela Libre de Derecho, Mexico City, Mexico. J.D., Cornell Law School; Ph.D. (law), Cambridge University; Ph.D. (law), Leiden University. I thank Professors Kerri Lynn Stone, Juan Javier del Granado, and Howard M. Wasserman for their comments. Dr. Marisol Florén-Romero provided superb bibliographic help, and Mr. Juan Gil provided excellent research assistance. This paper was presented at the conference “The Social Function of Property: A Comparative Perspective,” Fordham Law School, 2011. I thank Professors Marcelo Alegre, Gregory S. Alexander, Daniel Bonilla, Colin Crawford, Alexandre dos Santos Cunha, Nestor Davidson, Edesia Fernandes, Toni Fine, Sheila Foster, Tanya K.Hernandez, Carl Minzner, and Eduardo Peñalver for their kindnesses, thoughts, and discussion. A portion of this paper was presented as “The Social-Function Norm of Constitutional Property in Latin America,” in the workshop “Global Law in Comparative Perspective,” Harvard Law School, 2007. I thank Dr. Arnulf Becker and Professor Duncan Kennedy for their hospitality and observations. Unless otherwise noted, translations to English are mine.

1 “On peut dire qu’en fait la conception de la propriété droit subjectif disparaît pour faire place à la conception de la propriété fonction sociale.” 3 LÉON DUGUIT, TRAITÉ DE DROIT CONSTITUTIONNEL 618 (2d ed., 1923).

2 “Se puede decir que en el hecho el concepto de la propiedad como derecho subjetivo desaparece, para ser reemplazado por el concepto de la propiedad como función social.” Novena Sesión de la Subcomisión de Reformas Constitucionales. 19 de mayo de 1925, MINISTERIO DEL INTERIOR, ACTAS OFICIALES DE LAS SESIONES CELEBRADAS POR LA COMISIÓN Y SUBCOMISIONES ENCARGADAS DEL ESTUDIO DEL PROYECTO DE NUEVA CONSTITUCIÓN POLÍTICA DE LA REPÚBLICA 116 (1925) (citing Léon Duguit, as emphasized in reported text) [hereinafter ACTAS].
constitutions that adopt a definition of property that incorporates a social-function or social-obligation norm. Scholars familiar with the sweeping social legislation of the Mexican Constitution of 1917 have speculated that it served as the intellectual source for other Latin American constitutions that define property in terms of a social function. In fact, the origin of these provisions in the Southern Cone was not an intellectual imperial imposition from the North, in this case Mexico, but rather was the product of the transmission of European, notably French, ideas about the social function of property. The main source of these ideas was Léon Duguit, a law professor from Bordeaux, who wrote and lectured extensively on law and constitutional theory in the early 1900s. Duguit’s lectures in Buenos Aires in 1911 and their subsequent publication are the earliest structured exposition of the social function of property.

4 For example, Article 27 of the Mexican Constitution of 1917 was aimed squarely at the expropriation of large estates and at mining companies who owned subsoil rights. It led the way to widespread agrarian reform in Mexico. GUILLERMO FLORIS MARGADANT S., INTRODUCCIÓN A LA HISTORIA DEL DERECHO MEXICANO 194, 197 (1990). See, e.g. David S. Clark, Judicial Protection of the Constitution in Latin America, 2 HASTINGS CONST. L.Q. 415 (1975) (noting the importance of the Mexican Constitution of 1917 in the region’s constitutional development and its adoption of the “concept that private property must serve a social function”). Clark, however, does not jump to the conclusion that the Mexican Constitution directly influenced the Chilean Constitution on this point. Ankersen and Ruppert imply a closer causal relationship between Mexico and the other countries of Latin America adopting social function language. “In Latin America, the Mexican Revolution coincided with this year and its 1917 constitution . . . represents the world’s first example of what has been called ‘social constitutionalism.’ Following Mexico, other states in Europe and Latin America explicitly incorporated the Duguitian idea of social function in their constitutions.” And “Mexico, where the Social Function Doctrine has its Latin American roots . . .” Thomas T. Ankersen & Thomas Ruppert, Tierra y Libertad: The Social Function Doctrine and Land Reform in Latin America, 19 TUL. ENVTL. L.J. 96, 116 (2006). Ankersen & Ruppert are incorrect when they speculate that the Mexican Constitution of 1917 “did not use the phrase ‘social function’ since it was not until two years later, in 1919, did Léon Duguit use the term in his writings.” Id. at 101 n.190. See M.C. Mirow, The Social-Obligation Norm of Property: Duguit, Hayem, and Others, FLA. J. INT’L L. 191, 199 (2010). There is even mention of a Spanish translation of Duguit’s Les transformations générales du droit privé depuis le Code Napoléon from Madrid in 1915. Charles A. Hale, The Civil Law Tradition and Constitutionalism in Twentieth-Century Mexico: The Legacy of Emilio Rabasa, 18 LAW & HIST. REV. 276 n.45. Abelardo Legvaggi notes a Spanish translation from 1912. Abelardo Levaggi, Catedráticos Europeos en la Facultad de Derecho alrededor del Centenario 17 n.65 (unpublished paper on file with author). For a discussion of Spanish editions of Duguit’s work, including mention of a a Spanish edition of Les transformation générales du Droit Privé depuis le Code de Napoléon see Tomás-Ramón Fernandez, Duguit lu, l’Espagne, in AUTOUR DE LÉON DUGUIT : COLLOQUE COMMEMORATIF DU 150ÈME ANNIVERSAIRE DE LA NAISSANCE DU DOYEN LÉON DUGUIT, BORDEAUX, 29-30 MAI 2009 (ed. Fabrice Melleray, 2011) 255-263. The reason for Mexico not adopting this phrase in the Constitution must lie elsewhere, perhaps even the mere unavailability of Duguit’s work. Indeed, even after the Mexican Constitution of 1917, Mexico was subject to European thought on socializing its law. Juan Carlos Marín G., Ochenta Años desde la Publicación del Código Civil del Distrito Federal: Un Código Privado-social (1928-2008) (2011) (copy on file with author); José Ramón Narváez Hernández, El Código Privado-Social: Influencia de Francesco Cosentini en el Código Civil Mexicano de 1928, 16 ANUARIO MEXICAN DE HISTORIA DEL DERECHO 201-26 (2004).

These lectures spread the idea of the social function of property to many areas of the world and they produced direct effects in the Southern Cone. In 1925, Chile was one of the first countries in Latin America to adopt a social-function limitation on property.

This study traces the importance of Duguit’s work in the construction of the property provisions of the Chilean Constitution of 1925. It concludes that Duguit was the most important source for the idea of the social function of property in Chile. From the moment of its introduction into Chile, Duguit’s terminology was appropriated and expanded beyond its original

6 Duguit developed the idea of the social function of property from a number of French antiformalist thinkers who advanced the field of sociological jurisprudence. He borrowed substantially from the work of French doctoral student Henri Hayem. M.C. Mirow, The Social-Obligation Norm of Property: Duguit, Hayem, and Others, 22 Fla. J. Int’l L. 191, 216-219 (2010). Duguit came to the Law Faculty of the University of Buenos Aires as part of a series of invitations to European law professors the celebrate the centenary of the May Revolution during the first decades of the twentieth century. Others in the series, also leaving their mark on Argentine law, were Italian penalist Enrico Ferri, Spanish legal historian Rafael Altamira y Crevea, and Spanish public law specialist Adolfo Posada. Levaggi, supra note ___, at 1. For Duguit’s influence in the United States, see Id. at 196; Carol Harlow, The Influence of Léon Duguit on Anglo-American Legal Thought, in Autour de Léon Duguit, supra note ___, at 227-254.

7 Reading the text of the Art. 38 of the Peruvian Constitution of 1920, I disagree with Ankersen and Ruppert’s assessment that “[t]he Social Function Doctrine first appeared in Perú’s 1920 constitution, and was maintained in its 1933 constitution.” Ankersen & Ruppert, supra note ___, at 115. The provision from 1920 states, “Property is inviolable, whether it is material, intellectual, literary or artistic.” (“La propiedad es inviolable, bien sea material, intelectual, literaria o artística.”). This guarantee is followed by standard language concerning expropriation.

http://bib.cervantesvirtual.com/servlet/SirveObras/12160548630144839654213/p0000001.htm#1_4_ (last visited March 31, 2011). I agree that the Peruvian Constitution of 1933 contains a clear adoption of the social function of property in its Art. 34: “Property ought to be used in harmony with the social interest. The law shall fix the limits and extent of the right of property.” (“La propiedad debe usarse en armonía con el interés social. La ley fijará los límites y modalidades del derecho de propiedad.”)

http://bib.cervantesvirtual.com/servlet/SirveObras/89148405430358584943457/p0000001.htm#1_4_ (last visited March 31, 2011). The Ecuadorian Constitution of 1929 is another early example. Article 151 (14) of this constitution reads that it protects “[t]he right of property with the restrictions that necessity and social progress require.” (“El derecho de propiedad, con las restricciones que exijan las necesidades y el progreso sociales.”).

scope for political purposes. This redefinition of the social function of property continued throughout the Chilean use of the term in the twentieth century and was used for political ends by leaders as different as Salvador Allende and Augusto Pinochet.

I. Chilean politics and the Constitution of 1925.

The constitutional perceptions of property experienced a profound shift from the beginning of the Republic in the early nineteenth century to the early decades of the twentieth century. The Chilean Constitution of 1833 provided a classically liberal conception of inviolable private property. Property may be taken by the state only for public purpose and with prior just indemnification.8 Perceptions of property had changed drastically by 1925 when the Chilean Constitution was debated and promulgated. While repeating the guarantees of private property, new language in the constitution submits property to “the maintenance and progress of the social order.”9 8 “Artículo 12.- La Constitución asegura a todos los habitantes de la República... La inviolabilidad de todas las propiedades, sin distinción de las que pertenezcan a particulares o comunidades, y sin que nadie pueda ser privado de la de su dominio, ni de una parte de ella por pequeña que sea, o del derecho que a ella tuviere, sino en virtud de sentencia judicial; salvo el caso en que la utilidad del Estado, calificada por una ley, exija el uso o enajenación de alguna; lo que tendrá lugar dándose previamente al dueño la indemnización que se ajuste con él, o se avaluare a juicio de hombres buenos...” Chilean Constitution (1833), art. 12(5).

http://bib.cervantesvirtual.com/servlet/SirveObras/01371296566725907432257/p0000001.htm#I_11_ (last visited February 9, 2011). For a translation of the text into English see infra text accompanying note ___.

9 “Artículo 10.- La Constitución asegura a todos los habitantes de la República... La inviolabilidad de todas las propiedades, sin distinción alguna. Nadie puede ser privado de la de su dominio, ni de una parte de ella, o del derecho que a ella tuviere, sino en virtud de sentencia judicial o de expropiación por razón de utilidad pública, calificada por una ley. En este caso, se dará previamente al dueño la indemnización que se ajuste con él o que se determine en el juicio correspondiente. El ejercicio del derecho de propiedad está sometido a las limitaciones o reglas que exijan el mantenimiento y el progreso del orden social, y, en tal sentido, podrá la ley imponerle obligaciones o servidumbres de utilidad pública en favor de los intereses generales del Estado, de la salud de los ciudadanos y de la salubridad pública...” Chilean Constitution (1925), art. 10(10).
http://bib.cervantesvirtual.com/servlet/SirveObras/01477397766036628654480/p0000001.htm#I_2_ Later developments in Chile led to an even stronger assertion of the social function of property. The Chilean Constitution of 1980 as amended in 1989 provides “Artículo 19.- La Constitución asegura a todas las personas... El derecho de propiedad en sus diversas especies sobre toda clase de bienes corporales o incorporales. Sólo la ley puede
In many ways, the debate over the social-function norm of property was only one instance of both regional and global trends towards “The Social” in law and legal thought in this period. These issues found full expression in Chilean politics and the country’s attempt to describe property on a constitutional level. Indeed, the debate over the social function of property was one of the primary battlegrounds in an ideological war over the political direction of the entire country. Three major aspects guided political development in Chile during the decades leading to the Constitutional Convention of 1925. First, electoral reforms led to a parliamentary form that produced a period of political stalemates and ministerial intransigence. Second, workers organized and created effective unions and a new class mentality. Third, the military intervened in the political process and President Alessandri was both ousted and returned to power through military force in a short period.

Electoral reforms in 1891 led to a parliamentary system of democracy in which the president and the ministers were elected through a parliamentary majority. With stronger power in the Congress, this parliamentary system often replaced ministers and no particular minister could expect to stay in office more than a year. One scholar has noted that during this parliamentary period, “... congress forced an average of twenty Ministerial changes per president.” This uncertainty in the political leadership of the country was accompanied by party empowerment and entrenchment that resulting in one group of parties known as the establish the mode of acquiring, using, enjoying and disposing of property and the limitations and obligations that derive from its social function. This includes what general interests of the Nation, the security national, the utility and the public health and the conservation of the environmental patrimony.” Chilean Constitution (1980 as amended 1989), art. 19(24).

http://bib.cervantesvirtual.com/servlet/SirveObras/02438309769243830976613/p0000001.html#I_4_

12 RECTOR, supra note ___, at 130.
“Coalition,” led by the Conservatives, and another group of parties known as the “Alliance,” led by the Radicals.\textsuperscript{13} Between the Radicals on the left and the Conservatives on the right, the Liberal Party took somewhat of a middle position during the period. While the Conservatives apparently avoided any substantial splintering, the Radical party produced offshoots: Democrats in the 1890s, Socialist Workers in the 1910s, and Communists in the 1920s. In similar fashion, the Liberal party produced the Liberal Democrat party in the 1890s.\textsuperscript{14}

This was also a period of substantial labor and social unrest. Unions of workers gained strength and effectively went on strike to gain concessions from management.\textsuperscript{15} Strikes or protests over prices sometimes became violent and at times were only put down by the military.\textsuperscript{16} Deadlocked in its own internal political squabbles, the parliamentary government remained for the most part unresponsive.\textsuperscript{17} Although parties representing workers increased in power during the period, Conservatives and their allies were effective in stalling legislation to address aspects of what was broadly called “the social question.”\textsuperscript{18} The underlying concerns of these proposals were to re-emerge in the context of the debates on the social function of property and included systems of social welfare, workers’ housing, and public health facilities.\textsuperscript{19}

Arturo Alessandri emerged as President in 1920, after being supported by one of two Liberal nominating conventions. Composed of Liberals, Radicals, and Democrats, the Alliance convention put Alessandri forth as a candidate. The Liberal Union convention, composed of Liberals, Liberal Democrats, and Nationals, selected Luis Barros Borgoño. When the Conservatives joined the Liberal Union, it took on the name National Union to support Barros

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{13} Rector, supra note \textsection{130}.
\textsuperscript{15} Collier & Sater, supra note \textsection{195-96}.
\textsuperscript{16} Collier & Sater, supra note \textsection{196}.
\textsuperscript{17} Collier & Sater, supra note \textsection{196}.
\textsuperscript{18} Rector, supra note \textsection{131}.
\textsuperscript{19} Stanton, supra note \textsection{4 n.8}.
\end{flushleft}
Borgoño.\textsuperscript{20} When Alessandri advanced, he had been a Liberal deputy for Curicó and had been elected to the Senate for Tarapacá in 1915.\textsuperscript{21} He brought the hope of a stronger executive, the promise of social reform, responsive legislation, and a new constitution.\textsuperscript{22} Although these reforms were effectively blocked by Conservatives in congress, Alessandri was re-elected in 1924, but the impasse between President and congress continued.\textsuperscript{23} The election in 1924 realigned congress along more amenable Alliance lines, but in September, 1924, the military, with Conservative backing, stepped in to topple Alessandri’s rule and to govern Chile.\textsuperscript{24} Alessandri resigned, and a military and Conservative junta took control of the government.\textsuperscript{25}

At the beginning of 1925, a second coup led by junior officers who were more politically sympathetic to the middle classes and to Alessandri took power and he returned to Santiago on March 20, 1925.\textsuperscript{26} On his return to Chile, President Alessandri moved forward with his plan to address the “social question” and to draft a new constitution.\textsuperscript{27} The social function of property was a important issue in the new constitution, but it was not the only pressing issue. Other main issues addressed were the structural problems the parliamentary system had produced, the resultant political stasis of the system, the socioeconomic aspects of Chile’s cyclical nitrate industry, the relationship between the church and state, and the creation of an electoral tribunal.\textsuperscript{28} These various issues surrounded property and its social function.

II. Content of the debates over the social function of property.

\textsuperscript{20} Collier & Sater, supra note ___, at 201.
\textsuperscript{21} Collier & Sater, supra note ___, at 201.
\textsuperscript{22} Collier & Sater, supra note ___, at 207, 209.
\textsuperscript{23} Collier & Sater, supra note ___, at 209; Rector, supra note ___, at 131-132.
\textsuperscript{24} Collier & Sater, supra note ___, at 209, 211.
\textsuperscript{25} Rector, supra note ___, at 132.
\textsuperscript{26} Collier & Sater, supra note ___, at 211, 212; Rector, supra note ___, at 132.
\textsuperscript{27} Actas, supra note ___, at 11.
\textsuperscript{28} Kimberly Stanton, The Transformation of Political Regime: Chile’s 1925 Constitution, paper delivered at Latin American Studies Association, Guadalajara, Mexico, April 17-19, 1997, 2, 3, 12, 19.
In less than three weeks after his return, Alessandri appointed a commission to reform the constitution.\(^{29}\) This consultative commission grew from about 50 to about 100 members with those having particular party allegiances identified as follows: 26 Radicals, 16 Liberals, 14 Conservatives, 14 Democrats, 10 Liberal Democrats, 6 Communists, and 2 Nationals.\(^{30}\) The work of examining the extant constitution and suggesting reforms was carried out by subcommittees ranging from approximately twelve to fifteen members with President Alessandri participating and presiding. There are thirty-three published sessions of these subcommittees that met regularly from April 18 to August 3, 1925. The published sessions run approximately five hundred pages.\(^{31}\) Over fifty of these five hundred pages are dedicated to debates concerning the social function of property. These debates covered five full sessions and spanned about two weeks of deliberations.\(^{32}\) The constitutional definition of property was one of the core areas of debate during the process of constitutional reform.

From 1833 until 1925, the constitutional status of property remained the same.\(^{33}\) Property under the Constitution of 1833 was inviolable, and any taking of property by the state required a public purpose and indemnification.\(^{34}\) This provision followed the classically liberal notions of property found in both the Anglo-American and continental traditions. It is a view of property enshrined in the French Declaration of the Rights of Man, the French Civil Code of \(^{29}\) ACTAS, supra note ___, at 5. Although a fuller constituent assembly was contemplated, this body never met. Alessandri created two subcommittees. One subcommittee met three times and left no records. The other, the Subcommittee of Constitutional Reforms, carried out the drafting of the constitution. It appears this method of proceeding was influenced by the military. Stanton, supra note ___, at 7-10.

\(^{30}\) COLLIER & SATÉR, supra note ___, at 213 n.6.

\(^{31}\) ACTAS, supra note ___, at 46-527.

\(^{32}\) ACTAS, supra note ___, 81-137.

\(^{34}\) Chilean Constitution (1833), art. 12(5).
1804 (the Code Napoléon) and in the writings of Blackstone.\(^{35}\) It was this concept of property that French theorists Henri Hayem and Léon Duguit rejected in light of sociological approaches to law.\(^{36}\) Indeed, Duguit’s lectures in Buenos Aires setting out the social-function of property bore the title General Transformations of Private Law since the Code Napoléon.\(^{37}\) This title reveals that the French Civil Code was the starting place from which Duguit would chart the important changes in law, including property’s shift towards a social function. On the level of Chilean civil law, the French Civil Code of 1804 was reflected in the work of Andrés Bello’s Civil Code for Chile of 1855. Bello’s notes indicate that his Article 582 of the Chilean Civil Code corresponded to the French provision. Bello’s language is more elaborate, but asserts the same absolutist nature of property. It reads:

```
Dominion (which is also called property) is the real right in a corporal thing to enjoy and dispose of it arbitrarily, provided it is not against a law or against another right.\(^{38}\)
```

This definition of property in the Chilean Civil Code was the same in 1925 when the constitutional definition of property became a subject of scrutiny.\(^{39}\) Thus, until the debates

---

\(^{35}\) M.C. Mirow, The Social-Obligation Norm of Property: Duguit, Hayem, and Others, 22 FLA. J. INT’L L. 193-195 (2010). “La propriété est le droit de jouir et disposer des choses de la manière la plus absolue, pourvu qu’on n’en fasse pas un usage prohibé par les lois ou par les règlements.” Art. 544, C. Civ. (Fr.) (1804) (facsimile edition, 2004, Dalloz). “Property is the right to enjoy and to dispose of things in the most absolute manner, provided that one does not undertake a usage prohibited by law.” JOHN SPREKLING, RAYMOND COLETTA & M.C. MIROW, GLOBAL ISSUES IN PROPERTY LAW 27 (2006). “Since property is an inviolable and sacred right, no one shall be deprived thereof except where public necessity, legally determined, shall clearly demand it, and then only on condition that the owner shall have been previously and equitably indemnified.” Art. 17, Declaration of the Rights of Man (1789), http://avalon.law.yale.edu/18th_century/rightsof.asp (last visited May 25, 2011). Chilean liberalism was informed by the liberalism of the Spanish Constitution of 1812 (the Constitution of Cádiz) and by French and English writers. María Rosaria Stabili, Jueces y Justicia en el Chile Liberal, in CONSTITUCIONALISMO Y ORDEN LIBERAL: AMÉRICA LATINA, 1850-1920, 228 n.5 (Marcello Carmagnani, coord., 2000).

\(^{36}\) Mirow, Social-Obligation Norm, supra note ___, at ___.

\(^{37}\) LÉON DUGUIT, LES TRANFORMATIONS GÉNÉRALES DU DROIT PRIVÉ DEPUIS LE CODE NAPOLÉON (2d ed. 1920).

concerning the constitutional definition of property in 1925, views on the topic had remained stable, and property provisions in both public and private law had been subject to little examination. President Alessandri’s return and the constitutional convention provided the moment for property to be reexamined in light of recent academic work on the topic and of recent political events around the globe.

The idea of the owner’s absolute right to use or not to use property found in the Chilean Civil Code was consistent with the provision on property found in the Chilean Constitution of 1833. It was this provision on property that provided the springboard for debates concerning the nature of property for the Constitution of 1925. Article 12 of the Constitution of 1833 states:

The Constitution assures all inhabitants of the Republic . . . the inviolability of all properties, without distinction of whether they belong to individuals or communities, and without which no one may be deprived of the property of his dominion, nor a part of it however small, or of the right which belongs to it, unless by virtue of judicial sentence; except in the case of the utility of the state, defined by statute, requiring the use or transfer of some of it;
which will happen giving previously indemnity to the owner to compensate him or as valued by the judgment of good men.40

39 An edition of the Chilean Civil Code estimated to be from 1920-1929, contains the same language for Art. 582.
Art. 582 C. Civil (Chile) (1920-1929); CÓDIGOS DE CHILE 213 (ed. Eulojio Rojas Mery, 1st ed., Santiago de Chile, n.d.) (estimated date obtained from OCLC catalog entry). The official version of the Chilean Civil Code from 1937 contains the same language for Art. 582 with a footnote referring the reader to Art. 10(10) of the Constitution of 1925. Art. 582 C. Civil (Chile) (1937); CÓDIGOS DE LA REPÚBLICA DE CHILE 80 (Edición oficial, Sociedad Imprenta y Litografía Universo, Valparaíso, 1937).
40 Chilean Constitution (1833), art. 12(5).
http://bib.cervantesvirtual.com/servlet/SirveObras/01371296566725907432257/p0000001.htm#I_11_ (last visited February 9, 2011). For the Spanish text, see supra note ___.
Thus, until the debates on property commenced on May 12, 1925, there was a conceptual cohesion in Chilean law concerning property as expressed in the Civil Code and the Constitution. Property was inviolable and subject to the arbitrary exercise of the owner. Takings of property by the state had to be for a public purpose and with just compensation to the owner.

This conceptual uniformity was shattered in the debates. Radicals sought to redefine the nature of property by appealing to the idea of property’s social function. Conservatives sought to maintain the language of the Constitution of 1833 by expressing their concerns about the consequences of a change. Other members of the subcommittee sought some compromise. Members espousing property as a social function were Ramón Briones Luco (Radical); Nolasco Cardenas Avendaño (Democrat); Enrique Oyarzún Mondaca (Radical); Manuel Hidalgo Plaza (Communist) and Guillermo Guerra (Liberal Democrat). Members seeking a middle position were Arturo Alessandri Palma (President); Luis Barros Borgoño (Union Liberal); Guillermo Edwards Matte (Union Liberal); and Eliodoro Yáñez Ponce de Léon (Liberal Alliance).

Members who were property absolutists were Romualdo Silva Cortes (Conservative); Domingo Amunátegui (Liberal Alliance - Union Liberal Democrat); and Francisco Vidal Garcés (Conservative). Over half of these members were aligned with the Liberal Alliance that backed President Alessandri in 1920.

A. Proponents of the social function of property.

---

41 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 81.
42 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 81-137. Party affiliations are from Stanton, supra note ___, at 16, n.35. For a slightly different division of members into reformers and non-reformers, see BRAHM, supra note ___, at 34-35. For general biographical information see JORDI FUENTES & LIA CORTES, DICCIONARIO POLÍTICO DE CHILE, 1810-1966, 74 (Birones Luco), 84 (Cardenas Avendaño), 368 (Oyarzún Mondaca), 237 (Hidalgo Plaza), 24-27 (Alessandri Palma), 56 (Barros Borgoño), 164 (Edwards Matte), 527 (Yáñez Ponce de Léon), 465 (Silva Cortes) (1967).
43 Stanton, supra note ___, at 16.
The first to suggest changing the constitutional definition of property in Chile was President of the Radical Party and lawyer, Ramón Briones Luco.\textsuperscript{44} His first words asserted that property had already been modified by new social realities and that the constitution should be changed to reflect that “the idea of property is a social function.”\textsuperscript{45} Briones left no doubt that his aim was squarely set on large estates (\textit{latifundios}) and uncultivated land (\textit{la propiedad inculta}).\textsuperscript{46}

Two aspects of this attack on the absolutist definition of property are noteworthy. First, Briones adopted the exact same method of arguing for a definition of property limited by a social function that Duguit had advanced. Duguit’s conclusion that property is a social function was not, for him, an assertion of a new approach or theory of property. Instead, Duguit argued that through scientific observation of the use and function of property in society, he had discovered that property had indeed become a social function. Thus, the definition was, in Duguit’s view, nothing more than an accurate description of what had already happened.\textsuperscript{47}

Second, Briones saw the adoption of the social-function definition as a way of moving against the perceived problems of large landed estates and uncultivated farmland.\textsuperscript{48} In his urging for legislation to address the problem of \textit{latifundios}, Briones appealed to the example of rural legislation in Entre Ríos seeking to provide inexpensive housing in Argentina to the north of Buenos Aires. In Briones’ estimation, the legislation increased property ownership among farmers and improved agricultural production.\textsuperscript{49}

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{44} ACTAS, \textit{supra} note ____, at 85.
  \item \textsuperscript{45} ACTAS, \textit{supra} note ____, at 86.
  \item \textsuperscript{46} ACTAS, \textit{supra} note ____, at 86.
  \item \textsuperscript{47} Mirow, \textit{Social-Obligation Norm, supra} note ____., at 208, 212, 217-218 (same observations by Henri Hayem). The work of Joseph Charmont seems to have been particularly influential on this point for Duguit. Mirow, \textit{Social-Obligation Norm, supra} note ____., at 219-220 (citing JOSEPH CHARMONT, \textit{LES TRANSFORMATIONS DU DROIT CIVIL} (1912)).
  \item \textsuperscript{48} ACTAS, \textit{supra} note ____, at 86.
  \item \textsuperscript{49} ACTAS, \textit{supra} note ____, at 102.
\end{itemize}
There was already an extant literature on the problems of latifundios. While some of the authors Duguit relied on in developing his theory of the social function of property saw it as a means of attacking large estates, Duguit claimed that the social-function doctrine did not lead him to redistributist conclusions or class-struggle analysis. Duguit, however, did see uncultivated lands as a problem that required a solution that put the common good before the exercise of property. Furthermore, Maurice Hauriou, cited by Duguit, used the term latifundia as a one example of where property revealed its economic function in society. Hauriou was also apparently not concerned about the unproductive holding of land because, in his view, the market itself would handle unproductive property. Nonetheless, Briones was able to tie a social-function norm of property to descriptive accuracy and expand its scope to attack the propriety of large landed estates and uncultivated lands.

Another member of the subcommittee, Enrique Oyarzún supported Briones’s attack on latifundios, but refrained from supporting the definition of property as a social function. Oyarzún sought to distinguish between property as a social function and the exercise of property as a social function. In this way, Oyarzún was sensitive to an original difficulty with the translation of Duguit’s words, “[m]ais la propriété n’est pas un droit; elle est une function sociale.” In French, propriété can bean both “ownership” (the exercise of property) and “property” (the thing itself). Jurists have translated the French propriété to Spanish propiedad and to English property, when rendering the terms such as “the exercise of the right of property” (el ejercicio del derecho de propiedad) and “ownership” would have been more faithful to

---

50 Mirow, Social-Obligation Norm, supra note ___, at 207, 211.
51 Mirow, Social-Obligation Norm, supra note ___, at 208, 215.
52 Mirow, Social-Obligation Norm, supra note ___, at 215-216 (citing MAURICE HAURIOU, PRINCIPES DE DROIT PUBLIC 39 (1910)).
53 “But property is not a right, it is a social function.” LÉON DUGUIT, LES TRANSFORMATIONS GÉNÉRALES DU DROIT PRIVÉ DEPUIS LE CODE NAOPÉON 21 (2d ed. 1920).
54 JEAN-LOUIS HALPÉRIN, HISTOIRE DE DROIT DES BIENS (2008); OXFORD-HACHETTE FRENCH DICTIONARY 1591 (2d ed. 1997).

13
Duguit’s meaning.\textsuperscript{55} Oyarzún correctly noticed this distinction in his comments, but through the debates on the topic, this distinction was somewhat too subtle to be a point of real contention.

If Briones felt he were pushing the subcommittee too far towards a new definition of property, his social-function norm of property did not go nearly far enough for another speaker, Manuel Hidalgo, who lamented the fact that his communist ideas would not guide the meeting. For him, Briones’s social-function definition represented only an “acceptable minimum.”\textsuperscript{56} Indeed, Hidalgo was the only member explicitly to deny a “right of property.”\textsuperscript{57} Hidalgo also equated unproductive factories to uncultivated lands, urging their inclusion on the list of problems to be addressed. He suggested that a social function definition of property would lead to a very different economic structure for Chilean society.\textsuperscript{58} He even argued for a definition of property that reached beyond land and took cognizance of work and labor as a kind of industrial property.\textsuperscript{59} He urged the following language for inclusion in the constitution:

\begin{quote}
Property is a social function. The State ought to foster an economic structure that assures each individual and his family what is necessary for his life and for his complete development.\textsuperscript{60}
\end{quote}

With Hidalgo’s comments, momentum was clearly building against \textit{latifundios}. The adoption of a social-function definition of property was an instrumental step along the way to the redistribution of land in Chilean society.

J. Guillermo Guerra continued the assault on \textit{latifundios}. He affirmed the consistent opinions of the other speakers and appealed to the social reforms brought about in England by \textsuperscript{55} Mirow, \textit{Social-Obligation Norm}, supra note ____, at 197.

\textsuperscript{56} ACTAS, supra note ____, at 86.
\textsuperscript{57} “El señor Hidalgo (don Manuel) declara que él niega el derecho de propiedad.” ACTAS, supra note ____, at 120.
\textsuperscript{58} ACTAS, supra note ____, at 86.
\textsuperscript{59} ACTAS, supra note ____, at 106.
\textsuperscript{60} “La propiedad es una función social. El Estado debe atender a una organización económica que asegure a cada individuo y a su familia lo necesario para su vida y para su desarrollo integral.” ACTAS, supra note ____, at 86.
David Lloyd George after World War I. Guerra viewed these reforms as having resulted in wider distribution of land in smaller estates in the country. Guerra wanted the subcommittee to focus pragmatically on the problem at hand, the large landed estates, and he asserted that the debate over whether property was a social function or not was merely semantic quibbling ("un juego de palabras"). Guerra is one of the few subcommittee members to mention Mexico in the context of its resolution of latifundios and suggested that uncultivated land be taxed out of existence as the reforms of Lloyd George accomplished in England.

Guerra noted that there might exist inconsistencies between the protection of property under the Constitution of 1833 and the many limitations on private property that already existed under the Chilean Civil Code, such as servitudes, and that these limitations would not withstand present scrutiny if subjected to a determination of constitutionality by a court charged with reviewing such legislation. He also suggested expanding the underlying reasons for expropriation from public utility to social utility, local interest, or private projects for public good, such as a road or railroad. Guerra’s suggested provision was that the Constitution would protect:

The inviolability of the right of property, with the limitations established by law.

61 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 86-87.
62 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 87. Similarly, Edwards Matte when arguing for the invioability of property, also found this a question of symantics. ACTAS, supra note ___, at 110. Vidal Garcés too rejected any distiction between property and the exercise of the right of property. ACTAS, supra note ___, at 114.
63 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 87.
64 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 94. A number of members of the subcommittee noted the importance of this new power in the judiciary to review the constitutionality of legislation. This concern about the Supreme Court’s power of judicial review reveals the deep seated belief in the members that the Constitution would serve to guide both structural elements and individual rights in the Chilean government. Alessandri also noted the importance of providing a definition of property in the Constitution that was consistent with practice and the modern trend. BRAHM, supra note ___, at 56-57. Indeed, the definition of property under the Constitution of 1925 was the basis for claiming the unconstitutionality of legislation before the Supreme Court. BRAHM, supra note ___, at 58-66.
65 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 94-95.
In cases required by the utility of the State or social utility, a law may authorize the expropriation of kinds or types of certain property, the price of previous payment as agreed to by the owner or as determined by the courts.

Congress shall enact laws that facilitate the subdivision of real property and that charge special taxes on uncultivated lands.\textsuperscript{66}

Guerra’s argument followed Briones and Duguit’s ideas by asserting that the modern conception of property had changed and that a definition of property as a social function was most appropriate. He was one of the few members of the subcommittee to suggest that the German Constitution’s definition of property as a social function be followed by the drafters.\textsuperscript{67}

Similar to Guerra’s approach, comments by Nolasco Cárdenas asserted that he was not against property, but rather so much in favor of property that he wanted everyone in Chile to have some. Thus, the division of the \textit{latifundios} was a necessary step. His view followed that of others of the subcommittee that society had changed, and social changes have led to new ideas of distributive justice. These changes had occurred according to Cárdenas in Germany, England, France, and Russia.\textsuperscript{68} This led to a redefinition of property as a social function.\textsuperscript{69}

As expressed in the debates of the subcommittee, the Radical party and its allies were the principal proponents of redefining the nature of property in the Constitution of 1925. Radical literature after the Constitution of 1925 indicates that obtaining a newer, social definition of \textsuperscript{66} “5. La inviolabilidad del derecho de propiedad, con las limitaciones establecidas por las leyes. En los casos en que lo requiera la utilidad del Estado, o la utilidad social, una ley podrá autorizar la expropiación de especies o cuerpos ciertos determinados, previo el pago del precio que se ajustare con el dueño o fuere determinado po los Tribunales de Justicia. El Congreso dictará leyes que faciliten la subdivisión de la propiedad raíz y que graven con contribuciones especiales las tierras sin cultivo.” \textit{ACTAS}, \textit{supra} note \textit{___}, at 95.

\textsuperscript{67} \textit{ACTAS}, \textit{supra} note \textit{___}, at 95. Article 153 of the Weimar Constitution of Agust 11, 1919, reads, in part “Property will be guaranteed by the Constitution. Its content and limits will be defined by law . . . Property obliges. Its use also ought to serve the good of the community.” \textit{BRAHM}, \textit{supra} note \textit{___}, at 30.

\textsuperscript{68} \textit{ACTAS}, \textit{supra} note \textit{___}, at 101. The omission of Mexico is notable.

\textsuperscript{69} \textit{ACTAS}, \textit{supra} note \textit{___}, at 101.
property was an achievement of the party. For Radicals, replacing a classically liberal definition with one that hinged on the newer theories of the social function would have been a great victory in the battle between two different views of property from the perspective of the party. Radicals saw a strict divide between a Catholic-Conservative notion of property that maintained absolute rights and a modern, scientific perception that adopted the limitations on property through the social function doctrine. This strict dichotomy probably pushed both positions to extremes that were not inherent in the original expressions of these ideas. While anti-clericalism was most certainly a part of the Radical position, Catholic social thinkers had addressed social concerns and the papal encyclical Rerum Novarum of 1891 not only affirmed the right to private property but also noted that owners and employers had obligations. Nonetheless, the convergence of interests between Roman Catholics and the Conservative party led Radicals and others to characterize the Catholic position on private property as being completely contrary to the social-function doctrine. Similarly, it is not clear that the French concept of the social-function of property as developed by Duguit and Hayem would necessarily lead to the sweeping reforms Radicals had in mind. Duguit was careful to distance himself from socialism and redistributist policies. He did not adopt an analytical method of class struggle. Nonetheless, these finer points of the social-function doctrine and its origins were lost in the politically saturated process of constitutional reform.

---

70 PEDRO EDUARDO GONZÁLEZ GARCÍA, REFORMAS RELIGIOSAS, SOCIALES, ELECTORALES, ECONÓMICAS Y POLÍTICAS DE AL COSSTITUTION DEL AÑO 33 PROMULGADAS EL 18 DE SEPTIEMBRE DE 1925: EFECTOS DEL PARLAMENTARISMO EN CHILE 131-170 (1927). González García was a member of the Radical Socialist party whose doctoral dissertation at the University of Chile analyzed the Constitution of 1925, http://biografias.bcn.cl/wiki/Pedro_Eduardo_Gonz%C3%A1lez_Garc%C3%ADa (last visited March 21, 2011). The first social reform he lists for the Constitution of 1925 is the change to the concept of property. PEDRO EDUARDO GONZÁLEZ GARCÍA, REFORMAS RELIGIOSAS, SOCIALES, ELECTORALES, ECONÓMICAS Y POLÍTICAS DE AL COSSTITUTION DEL AÑO 33 PROMULGADAS EL 18 DE SEPTIEMBRE DE 1925: EFECTOS DEL PARLAMENTARISMO EN CHILE 131 (1927).

71 PEDRO EDUARDO GONZÁLEZ GARCÍA, REFORMAS RELIGIOSAS, SOCIALES, ELECTORALES, ECONÓMICAS Y POLÍTICAS DE AL COSSTITUTION DEL AÑO 33 PROMULGADAS EL 18 DE SEPTIEMBRE DE 1925: EFECTOS DEL PARLAMENTARISMO EN CHILE 152 (1927).

In the course of the debates, those advancing reform of the property provision of the Constitution of 1833 were not wedded to the conceptual or terminological elegance of the phrase “social function” and in fact as the debates progressed, abandoned claims for incorporating this term to impose defined limitations on property. Thus, Oyarzún, while using the term “social function” in his speeches, opted instead for limitations that promoted “social utility.” Most subcommittee members on the “social” side of the fence asserted the descriptive accuracy of property having some sort of social limitation or social function. For them, this assertion did not mark a radical departure from reality or from the present state of affairs; the constitutional definition had to catch up to what had already happened and what could be observed. This, of course, comported with the observations that Duguit and others had made about the shift of property’s characterization in the modern world.

B. Opponents of the social function of property.

Luis Barros Borgoño advised against any change in the definition of property because the wealth of the country and the stability of foreign investment were tied directly to a stable property regime. This was the only way to avoid capital flight that would occur from tinkering with definitions of property on the constitutional level. Thus, Barros put pragmatic economic considerations to the forefront of his comments and his resistance to changing the constitution.

---

73 Mirow, Social-Obligation Norm, supra note ___, at 211.
74 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 86, 93.
75 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 87.
Furthermore, in his view, steps towards dividing large farms and selling parcels to small farmers could be accomplished without changes to the constitutional text.\footnote{ACTAS, \textit{supra} note ___, at 103-104.}

Agreeing with Barros Borgoño that the language of the Constitution of 1833 should not be touched on the topic of property, Romualdo Silva Cortés directly rejected any notion of property as a social function asserting that property was “a natural right . . . an extension of human personality.”\footnote{ACTAS, \textit{supra} note ___, at 87.} The definition of property in the Constitution of 1833 was of the highest importance to the country. To play with it would lead to a litany of uncertainty in industry, agriculture, and investment.\footnote{ACTAS, \textit{supra} note ___, at 88-89.} Nonetheless, later in the debates, Silva Cortés expanded on his original position. While he insisted on keeping the original language of the Constitution of 1833 as it was, he also wanted to make additions to that language that addressed various broad social aspects. Joined by Francisco Vidal Garcés, Silva Cortés suggested draft language that the Constitution would ensure the protection of work, health, minimum wage, necessary rest, compensation for injured workers, peaceful resolution of labor disputes, the creation of economic and hygienic housing, and the security of each person’s life, morality, and education.\footnote{ACTAS, \textit{supra} note ___, at 105-106.} Echoing Barros Borgoño, Vidal Garcés indicated that redistribution of the \textit{latifundios} by the state had already occurred under the language holding property inviolable in the Constitution of 1833 and therefore increasing the number of small farm owners did not depend on redefining property in the constitution.\footnote{ACTAS, \textit{supra} note ___, at 113.}

Eliodoro Yáñez agreed with Silva that property could not be a social function because it was a natural right. His argument was grounded on the Roman law of dominion, a view of property in his view worthy to be enshrined in the Constitution. Yáñez, however, noted that the Roman owner’s right to “use and abuse” property had been modified by modern legislation such as the Chilean Civil Code’s requirement that the exercise of property rights comport with existing law and the rights of others. Yáñez also rejected any parallel to England by noting the great differences between Chile and England in capital, production, and transportation. Furthermore, the free market (“libre juego de las leyes económicas”) and increases in work and production were the best way to stimulate the cultivation of land. Yáñez’s proposed language provided for the inviolability of property but continued with a limitation, but not one evoking the term “social function;” “The exercise of the right of property is subject to the duties that by reason of public utility the laws determine.”

Domingo Amunátegui also voiced his opinion that the language of the Constitution of 1833 should not be changed in defining property. He gave the example of Russia, where large landed estates had been divided among small farmers as owners without the abolition of private property. As a result, Russia lost its place as the bread basket of Europe and had been replaced by the United States. Amunátegui addressed Guerra’s desire to subdivide latifundios by noting that changes to increase the distribution of land such as the abolition of entails (mayorazgos) and limitations in the Chilean Civil Code were possible even under the earlier language of the Constitution of 1833. Thus, several members believed some form of redistribution of agricultural land was possible without changing the constitutional definition of property.

---

81 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 90-91.
82 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 98-99. See supra note ___, and accompanying text.
83 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 91, 97.
84 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 97.
85 “El ejercicio del derecho de propiedad, está sujeto a los deberes que por razón de utilidad pública las leyes señalen.” ACTAS, supra note ___, at 100.
86 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 92.
87 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 96. For the abolition of mayorazgos in Chile and possible conflicts with absolutist concepts of property see Mirow, Borrowing Private Law, supra note ___, at 316-321.
Pedro N. Montenegro was another opponent to changing the text of the Constitution. His objection was milder than that of others who spoke of property as a natural right or of the need to maintain foreign investment and a growing economy. Indeed, he seems to have welcomed some of the reforms suggested by Guerra concerning the division of lands and encouraging more broadly the cultivation of land, but a system of punitive taxes was not the way to achieve this. These steps did not require a change in the constitutional language defining property. Concerning parallels to England, a recurring theme, Montenegro pointed to factual differences between the countries and concluded “. . . but you have to keep in mind what is good for England may not be for us.”

In counterpoint to the Radical, social-function, view, Conservatives sought to maintain the inviolability of an absolute right to property. Some, such as Barros Borgoño, based their arguments for leaving property’s constitutional status untouched on pragmatic economic concerns. Others, such as Silva Cortés, were girded by a philosophical conception of natural property rights. Finally, other members held steadfast in their desire to maintain the property provision of the Constitution of 1833 as it stood without making the particular underpinnings clear.

C. Middle positions on the social function of property.

Guillermo Edwards Matte sought a definition that would both maintain the inviolability of property and establish duties on owners. Apparently seeking to harmonize positions, he stated that adopting a definition of property that included “social function” would lead to confusion.

88 “. . . pero hay que tener presente que lo que en Inglaterra es bueno, puede no serlo entre nosotros.” ACTAS, supra note ___, at 100.
89 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 87.
90 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 91-92.
Edwards Matte observed agreement in the course of the debates on the idea of the inviolability of property as well as agreement on the idea that the right of property imposes some duties towards society. Thus, Edwards Matte saw Silva Cortés’s proposal as an acceptable compromise. Edwards Matte was also strongly influenced by the examples of other South American countries he perceived to be of equal or similar levels of progress to Chile. He quoted the recent legislation from Entre Ríos, Argentina, and the Constitution of Uruguay of 1917, noting their characterizations of property as either “inviolable” or “sacred and inviolable.”

Combining these absolute views of property, Yáñez’s language, and his own drafting, Edwards Matte produced another formulation for consideration. His text begins with the constitutional protection of the inviolability of property with unremarkable provisions concerning takings for a public use with prior compensation. It continues with some compromise between absolute rights in property and a social function: “[t]he exercise of the right of property is subject to the duties that the laws establish for the purpose of public utility.” Edwards Matte’s text then continued with many additional social rights including labor relations,

---

91 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 108.
92 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 108.
93 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 109.
94 “5. La inviolabilidad de todas las propiedades.
Ninguna persona natural o jurídica podrá ser privada de la de su dominio, ni de parte de ella o de su derecho sino en virtud de sentencia judicial, salvo el caso en que por razón de utilidad pública, declarada por lei, se resuelva por ésta la expropiación, la que se efectuará dándose previamente al dueño la indemnización que con él se ajuste o que fijen los Tribunales. No podrá en caso alguno imponerse pena de confiscación de bienes.
El ejercicio del derecho de propiedad está sujeto a los deberes que las leyes señalen pro razón de utilidad pública. En ese sentido podrán las leyes regular de un modo equitativo las relaciones de empleadores y empleados, velando por la solución pacífica de sus conflictos, creando instituciones obligatorias de retiro y previsión social, exigiendo razonable indemnización por los accidentes del trabajo, cuidando de la salubridad de los talleres, de los métodos y horarios de labor, estableciendo un régimen justo y prudente de sueldos y salarios mínimos y, en general, dictando medidas que faciliten la armonía del capital y el trabajo. Podrán también establecer servidumbres legales, prohibir la usura y las industrias contrarias a las buenas costumbres y asegurar el cumplimiento del deber que corresponde al propietario de cultivar el suelo en conformidad a lo que permitan sus condiciones naturales y económicas.
El Estado deberá legislar con la finalidad de conseguir la difusión de la pequeña propiedad y especialmente, con la de obtener que cada familia chilena llegue a poseer una habitación propia y sana.” ACTAS, supra note ___, at 110-111.
95 “El ejercicio del derecho de propiedad está sujeto a los deberes que las leyes señalen por razón de utilidad pública.” ACTAS, supra note ___, at 110-111.
social security, workers’ compensation, minimum wages, harmony between capital and labor, the required cultivation of land, and safe and individually owned housing.\textsuperscript{96} Many of these social rights reflected legislative goals that were not accomplished during the first term of Alessandri’s presidency.\textsuperscript{97} Indeed, such goals of security for workers to provide minimum pensions and housing were based on a notion of property that went far beyond the ideas of the social-function of property as set out by Duguit and of redistributing land through agrarian reform.\textsuperscript{98} Aspects of “social property” were also to find expression in the final text of the constitution.\textsuperscript{99}

Concerning a right to housing, Edwards Matte indicated that he was influenced by the German constitution.\textsuperscript{100} Oyarzún who supported the idea of the social function doctrine, but who rejected the debate over the term as semantic quibbling, supported Edwards’s proposal, perhaps because it got to the substance of social reform while sidestepping the definitional issue of the exact nature of property under the constitution.\textsuperscript{101}

Another member of the subcommittee, Héctor Zañartu, called for a clear definition without indicating his preference on the question of the social function. His call for precision was placed in the context of structural governmental functions because another portion of the new constitution would require a Supreme Court to determine the constitutionality of statutes.\textsuperscript{102} This concern had also been raised by Guerra.

On the first day of debates, President Alessandri attempted to build some consensus by suggesting that there was general agreement on the inviolable nature of property as reflected in

\begin{footnotes}
\item[96] Actas, supra note _, at 111.
\item[97] Stanton, supra note _, at 4.
\item[99] See infra note _ and accompanying text.
\item[100] Actas, supra note _, at 112.
\item[101] Actas, supra note _, at 112.
\item[102] Actas, supra note _, at 92.
\end{footnotes} the text of the Constitution of 1833. Nonetheless, Alessandri also saw some room for establishing limitations on property that reflected the social good. His examples of this social good were restricted to the sort of narrow limitations that already existed under established Chilean law, such as expropriation for public use and servitudes under the civil law. He chose not to address _latifundios_ and uncultivated land, the main areas referred to by those speaking before him.\textsuperscript{103} Even if there seemed to be some consensus on limiting property, the exact path to new language was difficult to navigate as it wandered through the various proposals of the subcommittee members.\textsuperscript{104} Then, for several days, Alessandri appears to have sat quietly listening to the debates without offering more guidance on the topic until the third day of full debate when he attempted to note agreement on certain areas.

Noting the uneasiness of some members when debating the right of property, Alessandri offered calming words from an unlikely source:

> To diminish a little the fears that some feel when the right of > property is treated, please permit me to read some paragraphs of a text of Constitutional Law written by Léon Duguit, Dean of the Law Faculty of the University of Bordeaux, an author who is considered in Europe as the first authority on questions of Constitutional Law.\textsuperscript{105}

Alessandri quoted Duguit on the French Revolution and its unthinking adoption of an inviolable right to private property that flowed from the desire of the members of the Constituent and \textsuperscript{103} ACTAS, _supra_ note ___, at 89-90.

\textsuperscript{104} BRAHM, _supra_ note ___, at 50.
\textsuperscript{105} “Para ir disipando un poco los temores que algunos sienten cuando se trata del derecho de propiedad, se va a permitir leer algunos párrafos de un texto de Dercho Constitucional escrito por Léon Duguit, Decano de la Facultad de Derecho de la Universidad de Burdeos, autor que es considerado en Europa como la primera autoridad en cuestiones de Derecho Constitucional.” ACTAS, _supra_ note ___, at 114.
Convention to guarantee their interests in property as members of the bourgeois class. Duguit then recounted the French Constitution of 1848’s enshrining a natural right theory of property.

From here, Alessandri quoted Duguit to note that the quality of property in modern society has changed: “Immovable property, capitalistic and inheritable, cannot be explained except by its social utility; and it will not be able to demonstrate that it is legitimate without at the same time demonstrating that at a certain point it is socially useful.” These observations led Alessandri to quote even more from Duguit’s passages regarding the nature of property in modern society:

Property is not an untouchable and sacred right, but rather a right that is constantly evolving and that ought to adapt itself to the social necessities to which it responds . . . One may say that in fact the concept of property as a subjective right disappears, to be replaced by the concept of property as a social function.

Having extensively quoted his European expert, Alessandri continued with his own gloss on Duguit’s work. Alessandri asserted that this was an opportunity to follow science and the modern world by modernizing the constitution according the scientific principles. In his and Duguit’s view, the inviolability of property had to give way to the legal reality (la verdad jurídica) of property with limitations. According to Alessandri, these changes were necessary to provide an accurate description of property in light of the Supreme Court’s power of judicial

---

106 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 114.
107 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 115.
108 “La propiedad inmueble, capitalista y hereditaria no puede explicarse más que por su utilidad social; y no se habrá demostrado que es legítima, si no se demuestra al mismo tiempo que en una época determinada es socialmente útil.” (emphasis in report of sessions) ACTAS, supra note ___, at 115.
109 “La propiedad no es un derecho intangible y sagrado, sino un derecho que está continuamente evolucionando y que debe adaptarse a las necesidades sociales a que responde . . . Se puede decir que en el hecho el concepto de la propiedad como derecho subjetivo desaparece, para ser reemplazado por el concepto de la propiedad como función social.” (emphasis in report of sessions) ACTAS, supra note ___, at 115-116.
110 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 116.
review of legislative acts and in light of the just limitations that may now be placed on property considering the “. . . state in which the right of property finds itself today.” Greatly in favor of the draft changes proposed by Yáñez and by Edwards, Alessandri’s country had a pivotal opportunity to “. . . adjust the right of property to the reality of things, to modernize the Constitution a bit . . .” and to unite Chileans.

There was little doubt where Alessandri stood on the issue. Alessandri sought reform. After Alessandri spoke, it was agreed that a drafting commission composed of President Alessandri and his former opponent for the presidential nomination, Barros Borgoño, undertake the preparation of a text for consideration. Alessandri sought a drafting partner who would represent more conservative thinkers on property and who would have fluidity in position on the matter. His selection of Barros Borgoño cleverly fulfilled these needs. Barros Borgoño’s pragmatic approach could be won over; a deeply held philosophical belief about the nature of property, such as that held by Silva Cortés, could not be so easily subjected to the political demands of the moment.

The day after being appointed to the drafting commission, President Alessandri returned with a draft. It was, in Alessandri’s words, the exclusive work of Barros Borgoño. Alessandri 111 “. . . el estado en que el derecho de propiedad se halla hoy en día.” ACTAS, supra note ___, at 117.

---

112 “. . . ajustar el derecho de propiedad a la realidad de las cosas, modernizando un poco la Constitución . . . .” ACTAS, supra note ___, at 117-118.
113 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 118.
114 “Artículo . . . La Constitución asegura a todos los habitantes de la República:

5. La inviolabilidad de todas las propiedades sin distinción alguna.

Nadie puede ser privado de la de su dominio ni de una parte de ella o del derecho que a ella tuviera sino en virtud de sentencia judicial o de expropiación por razón de utilidad pública, calificada por una ley. En este caso, se dará previamente al dueño la indemnización que se ajuste con él o que se determine en el juicio correspondiente.

El ejercicio del derecho de propiedad está sometido a las limitaciones o reglas que exijen el manenimiento y el progreso del orden social.

En tal sentido podrá la ley imponerle obligaciones o servideumbres de utilidad pública en favor de los intereses generales del Estado, de al salud de los cuidadanos y de al salubridad pública.

6. La protección al trabajo y a las obras de previsión social, especialmente en cuanto se refieren a la habitación sana y al oas condiciones económicas de la vida en forma de proporcionar a cada ciudadano un mínimo de bienestar, adecuado a la satisfacción de sus necesidades personales y a las de sus familias. La ley said his participation was merely to accept everything Barros Borgoño suggested. The draft had achieved the goal of defining “. . . with clarity and precision the modern scientific concept of property.” While maintaining the inviolability of property and the expropriation for public use with prior indemnification, the draft added new language responding to the social-function norm without stating the contested words “social function.” The new constitutional definition of property was expressed this way: “[t]he exercise of the right of property is subject to the limitations or rules that the maintenance and progress of the social order require.” Thus, Alessandri sought to assure the assembly that he only wanted to limit, and not to attack, the right of property.

Barros Borgoño commented after presenting the draft that the inviolability of property was maintained and his examples of limitations on property under the new text, such as limitations under the Civil Code or for servitudes under public law, were quite narrowly construed. For Barros Borgoño, there was no mention of latifundios or uncultivated land, clearly indicating that the constitutional text had reached a quiet and momentary truce on these pressing issues. Stating that the language did nothing more than reflect the present state of social evolution, Alessandri also construed these provisions to address a situation of particular shortage or national need, such as gasoline.
The proposed language now formed a new focal point for discussion and all involved in the debate stepped forward to voice their views. Edwards Matte returned to the theme of ensuring that the Constitution was clear in light of the new responsibilities of the Supreme Court to determine the constitutionality of legislation and provisionally approved the draft.\textsuperscript{121}

As one might have expected, Hidalgo objected that the proposed language did not go nearly far enough.\textsuperscript{122} Silva Cortés and Vidal Garcés were apparently satisfied that the draft had at least kept the inviolability of property and approved the text.\textsuperscript{123} Yáñez made a structural argument in opposition to the draft that the constitution should provide the structure and institutional balance of government. Defining exactly what property, beyond its inviolability, should be in the hands of legislators.\textsuperscript{124} To this argument, Alessandri responded that it was difficult to see where the right of property ends and the economic and social aspects of public law begin; they were related and needed to be addressed together.\textsuperscript{125}

Edwards Matte agreed with Alessandri that there was no clear line, and he expressed concern that without establishing clear boundaries on the legislative power to limit property rights, broad language in the constitution would go beyond what all appeared to agree on: labor legislation, an existing regime of servitudes, prohibiting usury, and creating a duty to cultivate land.\textsuperscript{126} Focusing still on the inviolability of property, Yáñez got right to the heart of the matter when addressing the types of limitations on property permitted under the Constitution:

The sensitive disagreement in which one is found with Mr.

Edwards Matte and, in part, with the proposition read in this

\textsuperscript{121} ACTAS, supra note ___, at 124-125, 127.

\textsuperscript{122} ACTAS, supra note ___, at 125-126.

\textsuperscript{123} ACTAS, supra note ___, at 127-128.

\textsuperscript{124} ACTAS, supra note ___, at 128-130.

\textsuperscript{125} ACTAS, supra note ___, at 130.

\textsuperscript{126} ACTAS, supra note ___, at 131.
session, is due to that it is thought, by this way, limitations are placed on future congresses, thinking of the fear that in them Marxist or Communist tendencies may come to dominate. But for his part he thinks that if such thing occurs, if the country organizes its public powers on this base and adopts this regime, the Constitution itself will be a dead letter and nothing established today will be considered.127

Yáñez asserted that Edwards Matte was opening the door to the very tendencies he hoped to avoid.128 Other members commented on minor points and concerns. Alessandri and Barros Borgoño responded with substantive debate on Article 10(5) and its definition of property evidently ending on May 26, 1925.129 The portions of Article 10 addressing property were later approved without modification on July 7, 1925.130 There were a few, later, unsuccessful attempts to substitute language in the draft and some final technical questions of numbering and of exact location and order of the text.131 The draft was submitted to a national plebiscite on August 30, and was promulgated on September 18, 1925.132 The final version making its way to the Constitution of 1925 reads:

Article 10.- The Constitution assures all inhabitants of the Republic . . . (5) the inviolability of all property without any distinction. No one may be deprived of the property of his 127 “El sensible desacuerdo en que se encuentra con el señor Edwards Matte y, en parte, con la proposición leída en esta sesión, es debido a que se cree que de ese modo se ponen limitaciones a los futuros Congresos, ante el temor de que en ellos puedan llegar a dominar tendencias marxistas o comunistas. Pero por su parte piensa que si tal cosa ocurre, si el país organiza sus poderes públicos sobre esa base y adopta ese régimen, la Constitución misma sería letra muerta y nada de lo que hoy se establezca sería considerado.” ACTAS, supra note ___, at 134.

128 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 134.
129 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 137-137.
130 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 337.
131 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 480-482; BRAHM, supra note ___, at 42.
132 Stanton, supra note ___, at 5, 22.
dominium, or any part thereof, or of the right which to which he has, unless by virtue of judicial sentence or of expropriation for reason of public utility, describe by law. In this case, prior indemnization shall be paid to the owner that he agree to or that is determined by corresponding judgment.

The exercise of the right of property is subject to the limitations or rules that the maintenance of the progress of the social order require, and in this sense, law may impose on it obligations or servitudes of public utility in favor of the general interests of the State, of the health of citizens and of the public well-being. . .

The first section maintains the language of the Constitution of 1833 and the theory of property as an inviolable or absolute right. The next sections incorporate the social-function doctrine, without, however, mentioning the term “social function” itself. Thus, in conscious self-conflict, the provision maintains two disparate concepts of property in the same text. Conservatives got their language; Radicals got theirs. Nonetheless, as the debates leading to text and the text itself reveal, a social-function definition of property had gained a beachhead in an established land of absolute property rights. Ideas of duty and obligation to the state and to society were now found in the constitution itself. For the future of property in Chile, both in terms of terminology and ideology, a purely absolutist liberal concept of property had been rejected. Although a right, property was now clearly a limited right and, of course, anything other than an unyielding line on the absolute right of property meant that the battle to continue 133 Chilean Constitution (1925), art. 10(10). The text may be found in note ___, supra.

the liberal absolute construction of property had been lost. The only question left would be how far the limitations on property would run and even though the term “social function” was not incorporated into the constitutional text, future debates on the nature of property in Chile would appeal to and expand the social-function construction of property.

III. The legacy of the social function of property in Chile.

The idea of property yielding to social obligations had been established. With the new definition of property in the constitution, lawyers and politicians worked to shape further their particular interpretation of the language. The trajectory for the next nearly 50 years would be the gradual expansion and remolding of limitations on property, often done under the broadly accepted principles of the social-function norm. The language of limitation found in the property provision of the Constitution of 1925 was read by later politicians and legislators as a social-function norm that would be aggressively expanded to a policy of state ownership of property and socialism under President Allende until General Pinochet’s coup on September 11, 1973.

In his study of reforms in the Constitution of 1925, Radical Socialist Pedro Eduardo González García noted several places that the new constitution adopted a social-function definition of property as developed by Auguste Comte and Léon Duguit. Despite the absence of clear language on the question of large estates and uncultivated land, González found that this new view of property provided the basis for legislation to limit aspects of ownership. He 134 Bárram, supra note ___, at 44, 52.

---

135 Bárram, supra note ___, at 261-262.
137 González García, supra note ___, at 164, 165.
cited, for example, a law of 1926 incrementally taxing undeveloped urban property to encourage building. Nudging the constitutional text towards the political aims of his party, González sought to place the new Chilean conception of property into the context of the Russian Soviet Constitution of 1918, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics Constitution of 1923, the Germany Constitution of 1918, the Polish Constitution of 1921, and the Yugoslav Constitution of 1921. González also took special note of the Mexican Constitution of 1917. Citing the Mexican Constitution’s famous Article 27, he characterized the document as the only other American constitution that adopted a social-function definition of property. Thus, González sought to place the Chilean Constitution within the group of constitutions that sought to limit property. He also asserted that the language of the Constitution of 1925 was sufficient to bring about the land reforms central to his party’s platform.

The contemplated structures of the Constitution of 1925 were not long-lived. In 1927, the Minister of Interior, Colonel Carlos Ibáñez, who had been an important figure in the second coup restoring Alessandri, imposed military control over the government. President Figueroa resigned, succeeded by Colonel Ibáñez under a plebiscite. Following the social-function interpretation of the property provision of the Constitution of 1925, legislation that would have been unheard of under the absolutist position of the Constitution of 1833 was now possible. From the late 1920s and during the Great Depression of the 1930s, Ibáñez’s government, the middle class, and the army advanced social projects that implicated a view of the social-function of property. Enrique Brahm García has noted a number of these activities. First, there were “colonization” projects for acquiring and distributing land in the vast and sparsely populated

138 GONZÁLEZ GARCÍA, supra note ___, at 164.
139 GONZÁLEZ GARCÍA, supra note ___, at 141, 142, 166, 167.
140 GONZÁLEZ GARCÍA, supra note ___, at 167.
141 RECTOR, supra note ___, at 148; Stanton, supra note ___, at 5.
142 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 68.
southern areas of Aysén and Magallanes effected through the Ministry of Southern Property. These projects required owners to build on and exploit the land allotted to them.\textsuperscript{143} Ibáñez also sought an increase in expropriations through the Board of Agricultural Colonization (\textit{Caja de Colonización Agrícola}).\textsuperscript{144} Second, the social-function norm also provided a basis for the creation of statutes regulating urban construction and development.\textsuperscript{145} Third, laws creating utility easements and public rights of way for roads and sewers grew to encroach on the private property of Chileans to advance the common good.\textsuperscript{146} Fourth, taxes and price fixing both allocated resources in the market and concretized policy goals.\textsuperscript{147} Fifth, bolstering Ibáñez’s interventionist approach to the economy, ministries and departments of the government fostered protectionism and the development of industry.\textsuperscript{148} These undertakings were all based on the new social-function definition of property.

In 1932, Chile entered a short-lived “Socialist Republic” under Air Force Commander Marmaduke Grove. For our purposes, this period of several months was not so important for its shift in government, but rather for the legislation it produced. Laws established during this period would have a lasting effect in the decades to come.\textsuperscript{149} After two months of laws advancing state control and planning towards socialism, the “Socialist Republic” came under the guidance of Carlos Dávila.\textsuperscript{150} Dávila moved forward with a program of the “socialization of property,” that included expropriation, subdivision, and collective exploitation of land through \textsuperscript{143} Brahm, \textit{supra} note _, at 69-70.

\textsuperscript{144} Brahm, \textit{supra} note _, at 82-85.
\textsuperscript{145} Brahm, \textit{supra} note _, at 72-75.
\textsuperscript{146} Brahm, \textit{supra} note _, at 75-77.
\textsuperscript{147} Brahm, \textit{supra} note _, at 77-78, 80-82.
\textsuperscript{148} Brahm, \textit{supra} note _, at 78-80.
\textsuperscript{149} Brahm, \textit{supra} note _, at 87-91; Collier & Sater, \textit{supra} note _, at 222-226.
\textsuperscript{150} Brahm, \textit{supra} note _, at 90.
the Board of Agricultural Colonization. Regulations touched staples such as wheat, flour, and bread and brought mining under state control. Perhaps the most lasting institution of this short-lived period was the creation of a General Commissary of Livelihood and Prices (Comisariato General de Subsistencias y Precios) under the Ministry of Work that continued to control many aspects of economic life including the production, manufacturing, importation, exportation, distribution, and transportation of necessary goods in Chile until the early 1970s. Dávila and the “Socialist Republic” fell on September 12, 1932, but their legislation was to be dusted off frequently over the next forty years in relation to the socialization of property. The forceful socialist agenda of Dávila was followed by a more moderate second period of President Arturo Alessandri who continued the General Commissary, supported industry, and advanced a program of agrarian reform now finding root in the property provision of the Constitution of 1925.

After Alessandri’s second period, Chile’s policy on property was guided by the Radical party which maintained control from 1938 to 1952. Private property was linked to the evils of capitalism and slated for substantial reformation. Mining, agriculture, industry and commerce were all subject to additional scrutiny, particularly under CORFO, the Consejo de la Corporación de Fomento de la Producción, charged with planning the Chilean economy. Laws and institutions of the “Socialist Republic” were called into play in the process. With reinterpretations of the constitutional property provision as a foundation, a law from this period 151 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 92. The Board stopped its activities in 1962 hand had settled about 4,000 families during its existence. Thome, supra note ___, at 11.

---

152 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 94-95.
153 D.L. No. 520. BRAHM, supra note ___, at 95-96.
154 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 97.
155 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 99-105.
156 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 107-108.
157 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 109.
158 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 112-115.
enacted in 1944, would later form the basis for an even more far reaching agrarian reform program.\textsuperscript{159} Indeed, Briones’s attacks on latifundios and uncultivated land in 1925 continued to have voice in the 1950s with calls in draft legislation to replace latifundios with middle-sized properties and to transform the Board of Agricultural Colonization into a “true Institute of Agrarian Reform.”\textsuperscript{160}

Beginning in 1952, the second government of Carlos Ibáñez brought heightened statist control of all aspects of the economy built on the structures in place from the “Socialist Republic.” These included price controls, new taxation regimes, expropriations, and attempts to reduce the payments for expropriated property.\textsuperscript{161} The new compensation schemes were so aggressive they failed constitutional scrutiny by the Supreme Court.\textsuperscript{162}

Despite such setbacks, property had been re-characterized sufficiently to permit sweeping legislation that limited its exercise according to the dictates of the state. Although the Constitution of 1925 did not adopt the term “social function” in relation to property, posterity read this concept into the language of Article 10(10) of the Constitution. This led to proposals to limit large landed estates, to ensure the exploitation of agricultural lands, and to direct urban development. The social-function norm of property had won the day. As examples, Enrique Evans notes acts and codes on water, urbanization an cities, railroads, roads, electrical services, aviation, and the important law of agrarian reform of 1963.\textsuperscript{163} Indeed, Chile’s constitutional provision on property was amended in 1963 to provide sweeping agrarian reform of rural lands with a system of indemnization that was greatly favorable to carrying out such reforms.\textsuperscript{164} The \textsuperscript{159} BRAHM, supra note ___, at 116.

\textsuperscript{160} BRAHM, supra note ___, at 122.
\textsuperscript{161} BRAHM, supra note ___, at 123-134.
\textsuperscript{162} BRAHM, supra note ___, at 134.
\textsuperscript{163} EVANS, supra note ___, at 25-26.
\textsuperscript{164} EVANS, supra note ___, at 26-27.
reform bore the name President Jorge Alessandri Rodríguez, President Arturo Alessandri’s son.165

The 1960s proved to be a particularly active decade for agrarian reform.166 Although characterized by a liberalizing tendency, Jorge Alessandri’s presidency brought forth and effectuated a substantial plan for agrarian reform.167 At the time, it was estimated that over one half of all the private land in Chile was owned by 375 families in latifundias.168 The law, yet again, asserted a limited conception of property, particularly agricultural property, under an attendant theory of property’s social function. Thus, agricultural property was obligated to be cultivated.169 Compensation for expropriation was to be made over time and land should be worked directly by the owner.170 The state was to take the lead in controlling, planning, and creating institutions to bring about this change.171 As might be expected, the regime for expropriation and methods of compensation to owners was the most difficult to establish and there were various proposals to loosen the constitutional constraints of Article 10(10) of the Constitution of 1925.172 The required Constitutional changes would come some five years later, in 1967.173

The eventual success of these changes flowed from a confluence of interests on international and institutional levels. Land reform was not now just a part of the agenda of the Radical party. In the early 1960s, President Kennedy and Alliance for Progress pushed for land

165 EVANS, supra note ___, at 27; KAUFMAN, supra note ___, at 45-76.
166 KAUFMAN, supra note ___, at 4-5.
167 Ley No. 15.020 (1962), BRAHM, supra note ___, at 144. This law eliminated the Board of Agricultural Colonization and replaced it with two institutions guiding agrarian reform until 1973: the Corporación de Reforma Agraria (CORA) and the Instituto de Desarrollo Agropecuario (INAP). Thome, supra note ___, at 11-12.
169 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 144-145.
170 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 148-149.
171 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 146-147.
172 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 172-177.
173 See infra note ___ and accompanying text.
reform in Chile to ameliorate what was still a greatly unbalanced distribution of land in the country. The Charter of Punta del Este placed land reform as one of the linchpins of institutional and economic reform in the region. The United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America (CEPAL), under the direction of Raúl Prebisch, and the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization both supported such undertakings on the international plane. The church, long aligned by Chileans with the Conservative party and an absolutist, natural-rights based conception of property, now called for land reform as part of a newly expressed social mission. In fact, even the Conservative party recognized it must accommodate land reform, as Enrique Brahm García quotes Fernando Ochagavía in the debates of the new legislation:

We believe in the social function of land. The Conservative Party, inspired by the social doctrine of the church, expressed through the encyclicals “Rerum Novarum,” “Quadragesimo Anno,” and “Mater et Magistra,” the base and foundation of its program, has not been able to stay away from this legal initiative of urgent necessity. . .

Thus, by the 1960s, the social function of property was no longer an issue for debate, it was an accepted view of the place of property in the Chilean legal framework. The theoretical underpinning for agrarian reform was the social function of property, the social function of land,

---

175 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 157.
177 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 158-165.
and the social obligation that property carried with it.\textsuperscript{180} This was particularly true for agricultural land which was “. . . subject to the limitations that national economic development and in general the maintenance and progress of the social order require.”\textsuperscript{181} Nonetheless, Jorge Alessandri, like his father approximately forty years earlier, saw himself walking a difficult line to harmonize and incorporate “the concepts of property as an exclusive right and of property as a social function.”\textsuperscript{182} Nonetheless, Brahm correctly notes that Duguit’s thought was still active in, for example, the draft of agrarian reform presented by the Radical party in 1959: Article 1 reads, “Rural or agricultural property constitute a social function whose exercise remains subject to the obligations of cultivating it, conserving its fertility and increasing its production in accordance with the advances of agricultural techniques. The owner ought to provide a just distribution of the profits of the land between all those who intervene in the process of its exploitation.”\textsuperscript{183}

In the mid-1960s, President Eduardo Frei Montalva of the Christian Democrat party turned his attention to obtaining agrarian reform that targeted the large estates and would dramatically increase individual ownership by those working their own land.\textsuperscript{184} The legal theory of property behind the new law of agrarian reform stayed the same; property was subject to social regulation. Under the new legislation, in addition to poor exploitation of land, the mere expanse of one tract of land under one owner was enough to merit expropriation and, indeed, almost all agrarian land became subject to expropriation under one or another provision of the new law.\textsuperscript{185} The legislation set its sights on both \textit{latifundias} and \textit{minifundias}, smaller tracts of

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{180} Brahm, \textit{supra} note \textendash, at 167. \\
\textsuperscript{181} S.C.D. de 25.5.1962, p. 1408 as quoted in Brahm, \textit{supra} note \textendash, at 166. \\
\textsuperscript{182} Mensaje de 1962, p. 287 as quoted in Brahm, \textit{supra} note \textendash, at 166. \\
\textsuperscript{183} S.C.D. de 14.9.1959, p. 3988 as quoted in Brahm, \textit{supra} note \textendash, at 168. \\
\textsuperscript{184} Brahm, \textit{supra} note \textendash, at 179-181; Kaufman, \textit{supra} note \textendash, at 79-144; Thome, \textit{supra} note \textendash, at 12. \\
\end{flushleft}
land in private hands that were economically not viable. Furthermore, it established an Agrarian Reform Corporation (CORA) and a Supreme Council of Agricultural Development to undertake the mechanics of redistribution. Expropriation became an administrative matter, rather than a procedure supervised by the courts. A new system of compensation based on bonds and payment over time meant that the state could rapidly expand its acquisition of land though means that mirrored outright confiscation. The new regime of property and land reform meant reforming the constitution, a protracted process of intense political debate that led to the successful amendment of the constitution in 1967. Ancillary legislation provided for reversing conveyances done in contemplation of the agrarian reform act to defeat its application, state control of basic resources, state direction of commerce, a plan for housing, and a taxation scheme designed to support these goals. The basis for such regulation was found in Frei’s interpretation of the social function of property:

Property should be maintained and respected. However, it should be socially regulated. No property rights should be allowed to exist which, in their implementation, damage the common well-being and rights of the community. . . . The agrarian reform will guarantee and respect property rights of those persons who meet the social functions these rights demand. The social functions are:

not to have accumulated vast properties, to have adhered to the

---

189 BRAHM, supra note __, at 188-189.
existing social legislation, to have included the peasants in the benefits acquired from land, to have created conditions of stability, justice, and well-being.

From 1970 to 1973, President Salvador Allende declared socialism as the primary structure for his government. Private property should be the exception, and the state should hold property as a means of production. Industries were requisitioned; businesses were expropriated; and general services were placed under government supervision and control. The government began to buy shares of private banks to nationalize, de facto, the banking industry.

Concerning agrarian reform, a new law sought to increase peasant ownership and to guard estates under 40 hectares from expropriation, but there appeared to be insufficient popular support immediately to move forward with these changes. Nonetheless, while expropriations in the late 1960s were measured in the 100,000s of hectares on a yearly basis, under Allende, they reached the millions of hectares per year.

Allende and his program of change came to an abrupt end on September 11, 1973, when General Augusto Pinochet and his fellow military commanders successfully launched a coup that would place Chile under control of Pinochet until 1990. In 1990, Patricio Aylwin took office as the first elected President of Chile in two decades. Pinochet immediately set to reverse the political and economic direction of the country. As Brian Loveman writes:

192 Thome, supra note __, at 12-13, translating and citing Eduardo Frei and Hugo Trivelli, Mensaje del Ejecutivo al
Congreso Proponiendo la Aprobación del Proyecto de Ley de Reoforma Agraria, in ANTONIO VODAVONIC, LEY DE REFORMA AGRARIA 13 (1967).
193 BRAHM, supra note __, at 230-243.
194 BRAHM, supra note __, at 253-255.
195 BRAHM, supra note __, at 244-247.
196 BRAHM, supra note __, at 248.
197 BRIAN LOVEMAN, CHILE: THE LEGACY OF HISPANIC CAPITALISM 257, 308 (3d ed. 2001). Pinochet continued as commander of the army until 1998 when he became a “Senator for Life.” Id. at 325. During his rule, “disappearances, torture, and murder were . . . to recur at regular intervals until almost the end of the military regime.” COLLIER & SATER, supra note __, at 361. Abuses are chronicled in REPORT OF THE NATIONAL Press censorship, suspension of civil liberties, the fierce repression of leading politicians, labor leaders, academics, and others supposed Marxist sympathizers merged into a “holy war” against what the military called the “Marxist cancer.”

From the perspective of ideas concerning property in Chile, the Pinochet dictatorship is famous for its neo-liberal, free-market reforms under the external guidance of the “Chicago boys.” Nonetheless, Pinochet embraced the social function doctrine of property. On September 11, 1976, in Constitutional Act Number 3, Pinochet’s Ministry of Justice sought to revise certain rights as expressed in the Constitution of 1925 to “incorporate contemporary constitutional doctrine and its international acceptance.” In fact, the preamble to the Decree Law states that one of the factors leading to these changes was that “economic and social development ought to be based on a clear definition and adequate protection of the right of property and its social function.” Thus, in 1976, Pinochet’s Constitutional Act incorporated the term “social function” into a Chilean constitutional text for the first time:

The right of property in its varied forms in all classes of corporeal and incorporeal property.

Only the law may establish the modes of acquiring property, of using, enjoying, and disposing of it and the limitations

---

LOVEMAN, supra note ___, at 261.

LOVEMAN, supra note ___, at 279-285, 291.

and obligations that allow ensuring its social function. The social function of property includes as much as required by the general interests of the State, national security, utility and the public well-being, the best use of the sources of productive energy for the service of the collective and the elevation of the conditions of the common life of inhabitants.

On October 21, 1980, Decree Law 1150 established a new Constitution of Chile that further entrenched many of the political, social, and economic goals of General Pinochet. The malleability of the social function doctrine was not lost on General Pinochet, and the Constitution of 1980 repeated the same social-function definition of property as found in Constitutional Act Number 3.

As in Constitutional Act Number 3 of 1976, the Constitution of 1980 contains extensive provisions regarding expropriation and appropriate compensation, the protection of small holdings, and the state’s power to explore and to exploit natural resources.

There is no small degree of irony that the social function norm of property found its 202 “El derecho de propiedad en sus diversas especies sobre toda clase de bienes corporales o incorpórales.

---

Sólo la ley puede establecer el modo de adquirir la propiedad, de usar, gozar y disponer de ella y las limitaciones y obligaciones que permitan asegurar su función social. La función social de la propiedad comprende cuanto exijan los intereses generales del Estado, la seguridad nacional, la utilidad y la salubridad públicas, el mejor aprovechamiento de las fuentes de energía productiva para el servicio de la colectividad y la elevación de las condiciones de vida del común de los habitantes.” Art. 1(16), Acta Constitucional No. 3, D.L. 1.552, Min. Justicia, 203 LOVEMAN, supra note ___, at 290-291.

204 “La Constitución asegura a todas las personas . . . 23. — El derecho de propiedad en sus diversas especies sobre toda clase de bienes corporales o incorpórales.
Sólo la ley puede establecer el modo de adquirir la propiedad, de usar, gozar y disponer de ella y las limitaciones y obligaciones que permitan asegurar su función social. La función social de la propiedad comprende cuanto exijan los intereses generales del Estado, la seguridad nacional, la utilidad y la salubridad públicas, el mejor aprovechamiento de las fuentes de energía productiva para el servicio de la colectividad y la elevación de las condiciones de vida del común de los habitantes.
Nadie puede, en caso alguno, ser privado de su propiedad, del bien sobre que recae o de alguno de los, atributos o facultades esenciales del dominio, sino en virtud de ley general o especial que autorice la expropiación por causa de utilidad pública o de interés social o nacional, calificada por el legislador. . . .” Chilean Constitution (1980), art. 20(23),
(page 1215/1288) (last visited March 30, 2011).

205 Id.
strongest and most explicit form in the constitution of Chile’s leader most aligned with economic liberalism and despotic rule. One would have expected Pinochet’s economic project to point in the direction of a conception of property as an unassailable, absolute, natural right. Instead, the language of the Constitution of 1980 perfectly co-opts the long-standing Chilean tradition of the social function of property and defines social function in such terms as to provide for almost complete state control over property as may be necessary for the goals of General Pinochet. And Pinochet worked actively to reverse the redistribution of land that had occurred in the preceding decades. Indeed, it is estimated that after 1973, only a little more than half the land distributed stayed in the hands of those who had received it either cooperatively or individually under recent regimes of agrarian reform.206

By 1989, the definition of “social function” in the Constitution of 1980 had been changed to the following:

The right of property in its varied forms in all classes of corporeal and incorporeal property.

Only the law may establish the modes of acquiring property, of using, enjoying, and disposing of it and the limitations and obligations that allow ensuring its social function. The social function of property includes as much as required by the general interests of the State, national security, utility and the public well-being, and the conservation of the environmental patrimony.207

Incorporating the social function and expanding this idea to include an environmental function, this language and definition governs today.

Democracy returned to Chile in 1990 with presidents mostly following the neo-liberal model established during the Pinochet era. Over the next decade, funding for public housing, health care, and education increased substantially. In the past ten years, claims for land have come from Chile’s indigenous population, notably the Mapuche, but there has been little inclination to engage in expansive agrarian reform programs.

IV. Conclusion.

The writings of Léon Duguit were the primary and almost exclusive source of the social-function norm of property in Chile during the debates leading to the Chilean Constitution of 1925. On the theoretical level, Duguit’s thought was the guide, his work defined the debate, and his terminology provided the focal point around which debate travelled. Although the Constitution of 1925 did not adopt the term “social function,” its text reflected the idea and in this sense it may be considered one of the earliest Latin American constitutions to adopt this new definition of property. Duguit supplied the idea.

Other foreign models and ideas related to property also touched on the debate, but to a much lesser extent. The second most important foreign influence appears to have been England and its social legislation following World War II. Germany and Russia were also mentioned in

RECTOR, supra note ___, at 213-214.
COLLIER & SATER, supra note ___, at 396-397.
COLLIER & SATER, supra note ___, at 401.
passing. Other anticipated sources for these ideas, such as the Mexican Constitution of 1917 or the German Weimar Constitution of 1919, played only a very minor or non-existent role in the construction of the social-function norm in Chile during the 1920s. The lack of references to the Mexican Constitution of 1917 is unexpected and runs counter to some established scholarly interpretations of the spread of the social function of property in Latin America. Indeed, after France, England served as a more important foreign model than Mexico or Germany. One recent study of the growth of the social conception of property in Chile from 1925 to 1973 notes the influence of the Weimar Constitution, but does not even mention Mexico in its introductory pages setting out the main themes. Thus, the place of the Mexican thought and the Mexican Constitution of 1917 in the historical development of Latin America must be reassessed, at least, as demonstrated by this study, in relation to the dissemination of the social-function doctrine of property.

Although some members of the subcommittee thought that precise labeling of property as a social function or that making distinctions between “property” and “the exercise of property” were merely semantic quibbles, the text as approved actually maintains this distinction. In this way, the constitutional text addresses some of the conceptual problems that had crept (and continue to creep) into the discussion of property as a social function. Indeed, adopting the phrase “exercise of property” much more closely matches the ideas that Duguit must have had in mind. In the context of Duguit’s work, the French “propriété” can be rendered either “ownership” or “property.” As Duguit’s works were translated into Spanish and English, “el

---

212 ACTAS, supra note ___, at 95, 101.
213 Perhaps the social implications of the Mexican Revolution and its constitution were considered too destabilizing for these Chilean politician who were drawn to Europe in their search for models. I thank Tanya K. Hernandez for raising this possibility. Additional research on the Chilean perceptions of the Mexican Revolution would shed light on this idea.
214 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 11-32.
ejercicio del derecho de propiedad” and “ownership” would have made more sense, but translators instead were drawn to the word “propiedad” and “property” instead. “Ownership” is, of course, “the exercise of property,” and thus, this formulation seems truer to Duguit’s intent.

With President Allende, the history of the idea of private property had reached the left side of the continuum. In the course of Chilean constitutional history, private property had been: (1) an absolute, natural right; (2) a right limited by obligations; (3) a social function; and was under Allende (4) a basic pillar of the capitalist structure to be dismantled.

While the text of the Constitution of 1925 speaks of property limited by particular obligations and never uses the term “social function,” Chileans after the Constitution of 1925 quickly interpreted it to include the full panoply of obligations implied by the social-function definition and even beyond the ideas set out originally by Duguit. Although not in the Constitution of 1925, the term “social function” was extensively used during the debates of the text and afterwards by Chileans attempting to define property for various kinds of legislation. The language of the Constitution of 1925 easily permitted the kinds of legislative projects sought by those trying to limit large landed estates, uncultivated agricultural lands, and undeveloped urban parcels. It is not clear that Duguit, the main proponent of the social-function doctrine, would have agreed with all of these extensions of the nature of property. It is clear that Duguit’s writings do not support the socialization of property contemplated and advanced by President Allende.

Duguit would have been even more surprised by Pinochet’s willing adoption of the term “social function” in the Constitution of 1980. Nonetheless, by carefully designing what constituted a social function, Pinochet was able to use the ambiguity of the term in his favor and herein lies a telling weakness of the social-function doctrine itself. Allende was able to push

---

215 Mirow, Social-Obligation Norm, supra note ___, at 197.
216 BRAHM, supra note ___, at 225-227.
property’s social function far the left and Pinochet was able to push property’s social function far to the right. The median position once sought by Duguit had been lost even before Allende and Pinochet. As soon the term “social function” was debated and invoked in relation to particular political projects, it was quickly construed beyond its original scope. The original meaning of Duguit’s concept became even more obscure as both Allende and Pinochet applied ideas of property to the politics of the day.